

Fourthly, the first requirement set down in defining the notion of a foundation was that knowledge of it must be prior to knowledge of realism. Two points about this requirement may be presumed to manifest, for unless the foundation of realism were known, philosophic realism would not be in this respect superior to mere dogmatic realism and, again, unless the known foundation were prior to the asserted realism, then